Dear Fellowship Applicant:

Letters of recommendations are a crucial component in all fellowship applications that you apply for. They provide unique insights into your ability and character that are not apparent in other parts of your application. They also allow selection committees to gain new perspectives on your work and your prospective project.

In selecting references, ask those who know you the best! If you are applying for a postgraduate degree or for a research opportunity, this person should ideally be in your field, as they can serve as an ‘expert witness’ on your behalf. Faculty are the main source of letters of recommendation, but some fellowships are open to letters from others who have gotten to know you--supervisors, volunteer coordinators, coaches--and can speak to your unique qualities. The rapport you have with this person should be the priority when deciding who might write for you. Faculty members should be able to talk about your intellectual interests and academic achievements in a way that sets you apart from others. They should know you well enough to connect your application materials to the goal(s) of the program. Other letter writers might speak to your leadership qualities, work ethic, community engagement, professional aspirations, or other attributes.

In asking for a letter of recommendation, remember that the more information you can provide your reference with, the easier you’re making their task of writing you the strongest letter possible. Use the attached guide as a reference for soliciting letters of recommendation for a fellowship opportunity, along with suggested materials that you should provide your reference in order to help them in writing a dynamic letter on your behalf.

And, of course, should you have any questions - whether about who to ask, how to ask, or how to best support your references along the way, please do not hesitate to be in touch with an advisor at URF!

Sincerely,

The URF Team
